LESSONS FROM SUFFRAGE

THE one overshadowing conclusion reached by every close student of the election is that the suffragists failed at the crucial moment to do themselves proud and to make some adequate return to the party and men who first succeeded in advancing them to the voting standard. For over thirty years suffrage in one form or another has obtained in this nation, but it has only been during the past eight years that the movement attained the importance of a national undertaking with all the privileges of a separate political party practicing autonomy and regulating its own affairs without any interference from the masculine elements from which the women sought as complete a divorce in politics as they were entitled to in their domestic affairs where conjugal ties were not of the most fascinating order.

Having attained the dignity of an independent political party, the ladies instantly proceeded to tell what a huge swath they were cutting and how they would be found in the van at the polls on the morn of election and how they would be true to the last gasp and all the other pledges which old died in the wool and born in the flesh traders would be pardoned for using. The Woman's party was going to teach the male bipeds that the women would be the controlling influence hereafter and that unless both parties conceded ample recognition the scalps of the candidates of that particular party would dangle from the belts of the ladies the morning after. Owing to this or some other argument the Hughes management granted every request of the women and were assured that they might begin counting 3,000,000 odd votes as good as cast. That is the way the ladies had it doped out. Wilson stood out against the importunate demands by asserting open hostility to the cause of suffrage. The result is so well known that it is painful to remind intelligent readers of what happened one short week ago. The women voted for Wilson, at least a majority of the suffrage states went into the Wilson column, and Hughes was defeated by the very force that he courted for the purpose of swelling a majority. The recital of facts furnish the most potential argument against an extension of suffrage. Wilson sees what the women did in yielding to blind sentiment and he is not going to play that side of the street, but will sedulously adhere to his already emphatic principles that the matter of suffrage is one for the states to settle and not a matter to engage the attention of congress.

The woman voter has demonstrated beyond cavil that she is a quantity of absolutely unreliable proportions with whom no political managers will endeavor to have anything to do in the future. The experience is too delicate to invite a repetition, for it is like a boy handling fulminate of mercury that may go off at any moment to his own personal risk.

As Mark Weller said: "Beware of the vimmen."

THANKSGIVING OFFERINGS

ENGLAND, Japan and France are to the front with their hearty thanks for the close call in this country by which their friend in office was continued for another term of four years. It doesn't require a prophet to tell why these nations are happy, but it will require some explanation to prove that the United States is capable of taking care of itself in any crisis and that, with a Republican working majority in the lower house of congress, any insane feats that the administration may attempt will be balked by the presence of representatives from the most densely populated centers of industry, who will see that no encouragement is extended the foreigner to extend his foothold by running sacrifice sales and bargain counter offerings in competition with American labor.

In this connection it may be accepted as a just rebuke to the Underwood tariff tinkers that the coal miners of Ohio who voted for the retention of Wilson are first in the field after election with a petition for an investigation of the high cost of living. These men say they cannot live under present industrial conditions and that, unless an embargo is applied to check the export of American products, nothing but stark starvation awaits them. This system of reprimanding extravagance after a battle of ballots shows the overweening confidence of human nature in locking the stable door after the horse is stolen.

BOOSTING FREE TRADE

THE possibility of the re-election of Wilson as president of the United States brought out in very forceful manner in the past ninety days the menace of foreign competition with the domestic manufacturers of this country through the operation of free trade and the Underwood tariff, which received the unanimous sanction of the Democratic party at the last session of congress, which completed the infamy initiated three years ago during the first year of Mr. Wilson's administration. Apparently the black outlook painted by Republican orators did not convince the majority of voters that there was any danger of disastrous rivalry in a business sense. Nevertheless the Berlin Tagblatt, one of the most conservative newspapers of the German empire, rejoices over the return of Wilson to the White House on the ground that this implies an extension of the commercial relations with Germany at conclusion of hostilities. Speaking of the election, the Tagblatt comments very learnedly to the effect that the danger of a protective tariff, which would have militated against the commercial supremacy of the Germans, has been banished and that a continuation of the Wilson regime will be "helpful to future German commercial relations."

There is an unprejudiced post campaign opinion for our Democratic friends to put in their pipe to smoke.

It does not require a telescope to discover the real silver lining to the election is that silver is strong above the 71 cent mark and likely to hold onto that for some time.

In trying to alter the Minnesota returns, the United States department of justice is becoming almost as active as the federal brigade at Reno in using the machinery of the courts to advance private interests.

If all the rabid coyotes are to be exterminated, how will we be able to feed the fecked jack rabbits?

Joy at the White House has become Tumultuous.

BETTING SETTLED BY THE OFFICIAL RETURNS

Whether or not an election is close the rule of betting is that the money or wager does not have to be paid until the official count is announced. Of course there is not much chance of a stakeholder making a mistake by accepting the newspaper statements, but, especially in an election so close as the recent presidential vote, it is better to await the meeting of the electoral college next month.
